

The pathophysiology of Type 2 diabetes involves insulin resistance in skeletal muscle, liver, and adipose tissue. The pancreas initially compensates by increasing insulin production.

Over time, beta-cell function declines, leading to persistent hyperglycemia.

Inflammation and metabolic stress contribute to impaired insulin signaling pathways.